Recent studies show some interesting findings about habit formation. In these studies, students who successfully acquired one positive habit reported less stress; less impulsive spending; better dietary habits; decreased caffeine consumption; fewer hours spent watching TV; and even fewer dirty dishes. Keep working on one habit long enough, and not only does it become easier, but so do other things as well. It's why those with the right habits seem to do better than others. They're doing the most important thing regularly and, as a result, everything else is easier.

Noise in the classroom has negative effects on communication patterns and the ability to pay attention. Thus, it is not surprising that constant exposure to noise is related to children's academic achievement, particularly in its negative effects on reading and learning to read. Some researchers found that, when preschool classrooms were changed to reduce noise levels, the children spoke to each other more often and in more complete sentences, and their performance on prereading tests improved. Research with older children suggests similar findings. On reading and math tests, elementary and high school students in noisy schools or classrooms consistently perform below those in quieter settings.

Studies from cities all over the world show the importance of life and activity as an urban attraction. People gather where things are happening and seek the presence of other people. Faced with the choice of walking down an empty or a lively street, most people would choose the street with life and activity. The walk will be more interesting and feel safer. Events where we can watch people perform or play music attract many people to stay and watch. Studies of benches and chairs in city space show that the seats with the best view of city life are used far more frequently than those that do not offer a view of other people.

Consumers are generally uncomfortable with taking high risks. As a result, they are usually motivated to use a lot of strategies to reduce risk. Consumers can collect additional information by conducting online research, reading news articles, talking to friends or consulting an expert. Consumers also reduce uncertainty by buying the same brand that they did the last time, believing that the product should be at least as satisfactory as their last purchase. In addition, some consumers may employ a simple decision rule that results in a safer choice. For example, someone might buy the most expensive offering or choose a heavily advertised brand in the belief that this brand has higher quality than other brands.

In his study, Gary Collins allowed a group of children to express their anger. They were encouraged to play with violent toys, to kick the furniture, and to freely show their anger. After doing this, the children were found to be angrier than they had been at the beginning. Expressing our anger does not make it go away. Tony Campolo expressed this truth in these words: “Expressing an emotion often causes us to feel the emotion even more strongly. Those who do loving acts usually feel love all the more. Those who do kind things usually end up feeling kind. And those who express anger usually end up feeling more anger. It may make you feel better for a short time to express anger, but expressing it usually doesn’t make it disappear.”

In fact, I’m not even sure where we’re going. Just sit back and enjoy the ride.” You would probably think, “That’s the stupidest thing I’ve ever heard — a captain who doesn’t know where he’s going.” Yet how many people who are captains of their own life journey have no idea where they’re going? If you don’t have a goal, you’ll end up somewhere you don’t want to be. Are you willing to do that? Or do you want to make your dreams come true? I’m sure you want the latter. A blind woman sits in a chair holding a video camera focused on a scientist sitting in front of her. She has a device in her mouth, touching her tongue, and there are wires running from that device to the video camera. The woman has been blind since birth and doesn’t really know what a rubber ball looks like. However, when the scientist suddenly rolls a rubber ball in her direction, she puts out a hand to stop it. The blind woman saw the ball through her tongue. Well, not exactly through her tongue, but the device in her mouth sent visual input through her tongue in much the same way that others receive visual input through the eyes. In her case, the tongue sends the visual information to the brain, where that information is processed and interpreted to form images.

Whether it's for work or for the newest TV series, we stay inside very often. But what would happen if you stopped going outside and were at your house all the time? A study of more than two hundred thousand people found a strong correlation between health and the amount of time staying inside. In other words, the longer you are inside, the more likely you are to be ill. On top of it, viewing man-made environments while staying inside was known to promote activity associated with fear and stress. On the other hand, many studies have shown that going outside and being in nature can have a positive effect on mental health. Researchers found that when people looked at scenes in nature, their brain exhibited more activity associated with stability and love.

Psychologist Anders Ericsson has described how figure skaters practice differently on the ice: Olympic hopefuls work on skills they have not mastered yet. Club skaters, in contrast, work on skills they've already mastered. Amateurs tend to spend half of their time at the rink chatting with friends and not practicing at all. Put simply, skaters who spend the same number of hours on the ice achieve very different results because they practice in very different ways. In Ericsson's research, this finding has held true for every skill imaginable, including memorizing complex lists, playing chess, excelling at the violin, and conquering every sporting skill.

Most animals do not do things as we do. However, that does not mean that we are better than they are. All living things on earth are valuable. Each knows and understands the world in his or her own way. We humans have unique capabilities that other animals lack. We can build cars, use computers, and fly airplanes. We can also think about abstract ideas, plan for the future, and worry about our taxes. But we cannot run as fast as cheetahs, see as well as hawks, swim like dolphins, or soar like eagles. So rather than thinking other animals are not as smart or capable as we are, we should realize that they are just different from us and accept it. Animals are certainly not less than humans.

Have you experienced that you feel a stronger craving for chocolate when you are having a bad day? The food we eat affects the way we think and feel throughout the day. It is sometimes called the 'food-mood connection': what we eat can affect how we feel. For example, eating omega 3 rich foods like nuts and fish may improve your mood as well as lower your cholesterol level. Consuming fresh and natural foods can help you become more calm. Compared to repeatedly reading, testing your knowledge for yourself can feel uncomfortable, especially when the new learning is hard to recall. It does not feel as productive as repeatedly reading your class notes feels. But there is something you don't sense when you're struggling to retrieve new learning. It is the fact that every time you work hard to recall a memory, you actually strengthen it. Everybody in the world is seeking happiness and there is one sure way to find it. It isn't what you have or what you are doing that makes you happy or unhappy. It is what you think about it. For example, two people may be in the same place, doing the same thing; both may have about an equal amount of money and prestige — and yet one may be miserable and the other happy. Why? Because of a different mental attitude. I have seen many happy faces among the poor peasants toiling with their primitive tools in the devastating heat. When it comes to learning chemistry, if you listen to lectures and think to yourself, "Yes, I understand that," you should keep one thing in mind; you would not be able to explain it to someone the following day when asked about what you've learned if you have done nothing else to reinforce what you heard. This is because listening to lectures or reading a textbook only gives you passive knowledge. The old Hippocrates saying, “Let food be your medicine and medicine be your food,” is quoted all the time in hundreds of diet books. However, this is true only to some extent. Food may balance and sustain your body so that it can heal on its own, but the food itself is not fixing your medical problem, and a diet book should never replace a doctor. Food can keep you healthy, but it’s not a cure-all. A lot of books, websites, and people may tell you differently. They may claim that this or that food will treat or cure of all kinds of chronic diseases like cancer, diabetes, heart disease, allergies, and even psychological problems. You may not know about the power of good feelings, and so your feelings are just reactions or responses to what happens to you. You have put your feelings on auto-pilot, instead of deliberately taking charge of them. When something good happens, you feel good. When something bad happens, you feel bad. You don’t realize that your feelings are the cause of what is happening to you. As you react with negative feelings to something that has happened, you give out more negative feelings, and you receive back more negative circumstances. You become trapped in a cycle by your own feelings. Your life goes around and around in circles, not getting anywhere, like a hamster on a wheel. Perhaps the most important of all success factors is knowing exactly what you want, in each area of your life. Knowing what you want dramatically increases the probabilities that you will get it. The primary reason for underachievement and failure is confusion about goals. Failure comes from the inability to decide exactly what you want, what it will look like, when you want it, and how you will achieve it. As a motivational speaker Zig Ziglar says, the great majority of people are “wandering generalities” rather than “meaningful specifics.” The fact is that you can’t hit a target that you can’t see. If you don’t know where you’re going, you will probably end up somewhere else. You need to set clear, specific goals for every part of your life.

According to research on communication, we only understand 25 to 50 percent of what we hear because we are too busy talking and interrupting to actually listen. We only half listen because we don’t care, we think we’ve heard it before, or we are more interested in pursuing our own plan. As kids, we were told we had two ears and one mouth for a reason. Yet, for most of us, the advice fell on deaf ears, and we still talk more than we listen. If you are not a Globally, there is a bigger market for ice cream products in cold climate countries than in those with hot climates. Northern Europeans consume more ice cream than Southern Europeans. There are many different explanations as to why ice cream consumption is higher in the north than in the south, but one of the most accepted explanations is the product experience and familiarity. Consumers who have a familiarity with ice want this cold ice experience during the summer time. However, consumers who have never seen ice would not look for it during a hot summer's day. A scientist sat observing wild chimpanzees in Tanzania, in Africa. The chimp she called Flint had always been unusually attached to his mother. Even as an adolescent, he shared her nest at night. When his mother died, Flint stopped spending time with other chimps. He hardly ate. He climbed a tree to the nest he and his mother had shared. For a long time he stood there, staring into space. "It was as though he were remembering," says Jane Goodall, the world-famous researcher of chimpanzees who saw the scene. Stories like this suggest that animals have emotional feelings. However, not everyone agrees that there is proof of animal emotions. Why the doubt? "You can't do an experiment to find out," says Joseph LeDoux. "An animal can't tell you. There's a general belief, most likely resulting from extensive marketing measures, that electric cars are the cleanest means of transportation, and that the technology should be hastily adopted in order to save our planet. While it's true that electric cars have virtually zero emissions during operation, lots of research by scientists and environmentalists has found that electric cars can be twice as harmful to the environment than ordinary cars. In most countries, most of all, the electricity that is needed to power such automobiles is generated from fossil fuel which is much more harmful to the environment. It has also been revealed that electric car factories emitted more toxic waste than conventional car factories and that the production of batteries and electric motors used by electric cars requires many toxic minerals. It is no exaggeration to say that our faith in electric cars is wrong.

When children are born, they have the capability of producing any sound made in any language spoken in the world. During their early years, they hear and make the sounds in their language. The more time parents spend talking with their child, the richer the language development of that child. As children begin to say their first words, feedback from those around them helps them to learn the meaning of the words. What we throw away says much about what kind of people we are and how we live. Through trash, we sure do learn a lot about ourselves. For example, some researchers documented how average Americans overestimated their intake of healthy foods. People claimed they eat three times as much cottage cheese, which is known to be good for health, as they actually purchase, based on the number of containers found in their garbage. And they vastly underestimated their less healthy eating habits. Potato chips, for instance, were reported to be eaten in quantities 81 percent smaller than the crumpled chip bags in the trash actually documented. It is useless to try to achieve a perfect outcome from the start. It also brings about unnecessary stress. Every skill needs to be learned; every project needs to be set up; every action requires a strategy; and patience is the key here. Sometimes it takes years until you achieve your goal. There are sequences for everything. For example, you can't get the corn unless you plant the seed first. Even those who seemingly became successful overnight have endured struggles that you are unaware of. Opening up the world to your students, in the form of what you've done and what you've learned, is an important part of your job. The slower the river, the smaller the particles it can transport, so that they are deposited in order of size, i.e., gravel, silt, mud. In places where a large river runs through a flat area of land, the tendency is for the land to become seasonally flooded as the river rises following high rainfall upstream. The river has enough energy to transport greater amounts of material, which ends up deposited over the land. Over time, the area becomes coated with deposited material to become a level floodplain. Language play is good for children's language learning and development, and therefore we should strongly encourage, and even join in their language play. However, the play must be owned by the children. If it becomes another educational tool for adults to use to produce outcomes, it loses its very essence. Children need to be able to delight in creative and immediate language play, to say silly things and make themselves laugh, and to have control over the pace, timing, direction, and flow. If you walk into a room that smells of freshly baked bread, you quickly detect the rather pleasant smell. However, stay in the room for a few minutes, and the smell will seem to disappear. In fact, the only way to reawaken it is to walk out of the room and come back in again. The exact same concept applies to many areas of our lives, including happiness. Everyone has something to be happy about. Perhaps they have a loving partner, good health, a satisfying job, a roof over their heads, or enough food to eat. As time passes, however, they get used to what they have and, just like the smell of fresh bread, these wonderful assets disappear from their consciousness. Have you ever wondered why a dog doesn't fall over when he changes directions while running? When a dog is running and has to turn quickly, he throws the front part of his body in the direction he wants to go. His back then bends, but his hind part will still continue in the original direction. Naturally, this turning movement might result in the dog's hind part swinging wide. And this could greatly slow his rate of movement or even cause the dog to fall over as he tries to make a high-speed turn. However, the dog's tail helps to prevent this. Throwing his tail in the same direction that his body is turning serves to reduce the tendency to spin off course.

Many people suppose that to keep bees, it is necessary to have a large garden in the country; but this is a mistake. Bees will, of course, do better in the midst of fruit blossoms in May and white clovers in June than in a city where they have to fly a long distance to reach the open fields. However, bees can be kept with profit even under unfavorable circumstances. Bees do very well in the suburbs of large cities since the series of flowers in the gardens of the villas allow a constant supply of honey from early spring until autumn. Therefore, almost every person—except those who are seriously afraid of bees—can keep them profitably and enjoyably.

No one can live a stress-free life. We face stress in our work or in relationships almost every day. But not all stress is bad. As a matter of fact, life without stress would seem boring and empty, and a small amount of stress is beneficial for your brain and body. Stress can help you keep focused, sharpen your senses, and improve your recall. Some people use stress positively to increase their performance and achieve their goals. Also, medical studies have shown that stress can strengthen the immune system and protect against some diseases. It's only when stress continues for a long period or becomes too much, that it negatively affects our health and well-being.

Information and communication technology is now a normal part of modern life, used by everyone from children to elders. So children need to grow up making use of technology such as mobile phones if they are to be able to fully participate in contemporary society. The average age at which children get their first mobile phone is eight according to a recent study. To prevent a child from using a mobile phone at that age is to put them at a clear social disadvantage compared with their peers. Children's mobile phone use can develop various skills necessary for the modern workplace requiring a digital mind. In addition, children often have better phone manners than adults, and such manners are the direct consequence of familiarity with the device. If your kids want to use a mobile phone, just let them make use of it. You won't regret it.

Many people think spiders are insects, but they are not. Insects have six legs and three body parts. Spiders have eight legs and two body parts. Spiders do not have wings but insects do. Spiders use hairs on their bodies to sense the world around them. Insects sense things with feelers that grow on their heads. Contrary to popular belief, most spider bites are not dangerous to humans. Of the 40,000 species of spiders, only about 30 species produce bites that may cause illness. Spiders rarely attack humans unless they feel threatened, and if they do bite, the wound is rarely serious. Since spiders feed on insects, some spiders are considered “beneficial.” But spiders have no way of knowing whether or not an insect is a pest. In fact, when it comes to food, spiders are not choosy. While it's true that some businesses have started and grown without a business plan, there are many more that did and do have business plans. Is a business plan a magic pill for success? No. There are many businesses out there that had business plans and failed. However, a business plan can be a blueprint or road map to help your business grow. You wouldn't build a house without a blueprint. You wouldn't go on a long trip without a road map. Building and growing a business works on the same principles as building a house and going on a long trip. A business plan is a guide that can show you what you're going to need on your journey. Some everyday problems, small or large, come up in a child's life. If a parent takes too active a role in solving his or her child's problems, the child will be robbed of the experiences necessary to learn to solve problems on his or her own later in life. Solving the children's problems teaches the children that they do not have to be responsible for their own actions, and they do not have to solve their own problems. What's more, the chances are that you are implying that the child cannot solve his or her problems. Letting children solve their own problems is a very important lesson. Failing to give them this opportunity robs them of so much.

Comparing ourselves with others often leads us to want things that have very little to do with our own needs or preferences. Predicate your choices in life on what you deeply want, not what the external world makes you think you want. If, for instance, you want to lose ten pounds, do so because you want to, not because you are concerned with what others think. Or if you want to buy a new car, do so because you genuinely like and want that car, not because your neighbor or best friend has the same one and you are trying to fit in or keep up. Make decisions for your own satisfaction instead of trying to impress others.

These days, what's really remarkable is that more and more kids are becoming vegetarians. Have you spent any time lately reading children's books? There is barely a human being in them, until you get to at least teen literature. And I'm not just talking about The Three Bears and The Three Little Pigs, although those are good places to start. From the bears, cats, and worms in Richard Scarry's books to Curious George the monkey to the pig family in Olivia, all of the characters that kids love are animals. Some people can talk a good deal, and you will often encounter people who deliver a lot of lip-service during meetings. How many meetings have you attended where someone spoke all the time, while they never took any follow-up action later? This is an interesting product of modern society. People are taught to express themselves to impress others. And some of them overdo it at the expense of their actions. In many cases, the talk from these people is merely a disguise for a grave lack of drive. They only mask their lack of productivity and creativity with lengthy speeches. But people around them, before long, discover that they only speak, without doing what is necessary. Once you've identified your fears, you should remember that sometimes the only thing you can regulate is your behavior and attitude. You can't manage what happens to your luggage once you hand it to an airline employee at the airport. But what you can manage is what you pack in your carry-on bag. If you have your most important belongings and an extra change of clothing with you, it won't feel like such an emergency even if your luggage doesn't arrive at your destination on time. By concentrating on what you can do, it is much easier to let go of worrying about what you can't. Starting your day with a healthy breakfast increases your chance of being active in the hours that follow. This helps you eat well throughout the day. Consuming the right foods and adding activity makes for a much better night's sleep. This sound night of sleep will make it even easier to eat well and move more the next day. In contrast, a terrible night of sleep immediately threatens the other two areas. That bad night of sleep makes you want a less healthy breakfast and decreases the possibility of being active. In the worst case scenario, all three elements start to work against you, creating a downward movement that makes each day progressively worse. Eating, moving, and sleeping build on one another.

Governments can fight poverty and hunger by developing their country's transportation systems. If they can link each village and city, the country's economic level will certainly increase a lot. Transportation systems cannot fight against the problems directly, but they can help industries — especially small industries — and agriculture. With the help of transportation systems, people in villages and small communities can take things made from small industries and agriculture to the cities to sell. That way, they can earn more. With so much extra food, fuel, sunscreen, medication, toothpaste, toilet paper, maps, guidebooks, and whatever else you think you might need for a long trip, your load can get ridiculously heavy. Packing lightly on a long trip is far more important than packing lightly on a short one. You must be careful with every ounce. You must analyze every single item in your backpack to see if it's possible to leave it behind. Also consider purchasing some lighter equipment — the lightest tent money can buy, a light sleeping bag, a light backpack, etc. A pound is a big deal when you're carrying it weeks at a time for hundreds or even thousands of miles. It is easy to judge people based on their actions. We are often taught to put more value in actions than words, and for good reason. The actions of others often speak volumes louder than their words. However, when someone exhibits some difficult behavior, you might want to reserve judgement for later. People are not always defined by their behavior. It is common to think, “He is so bossy,” or “She is so mean,” after observing less than desirable behavior in someone. But you should never make such assumptions right away. You should give someone a second chance before you label them and shut them out forever. Mention the word “criticism,” and we all imagine something negative and painful. The pain that criticism causes comes from wounded pride. No matter what it is, there is the hidden sense that “I’m no good.” However, criticism doesn’t mean you’re no good. It means, “You’re good, but I believe you can be even better.” For example, think of what an Olympic athlete willingly endures from his or her coaches! One of the reasons we have difficulty accepting criticism is because it comes at times when we’re not emotionally prepared. It makes us offensive and upset. The expansion of businesses that lease equipment and personnel to firms has been a contributing factor in the growth of the service sector. More and more firms are looking to outsource some elements of their operation. They often start with elements that are not part of the firm's core product or business. For example, most hotels that host meetings and conventions have outsourced the servicing of the audiovisual needs of groups to a company that specializes in that type of business. The company, in turn, leases the audiovisual equipment to groups that are holding meetings in the hotel. The company is able to provide more up-to-date and specialized equipment to groups than the hotel might if it provided the service itself. If you put candy in front of a group of children and tell them that if they can resist eating it they will eventually receive even more candy, a few interesting behaviors will follow. Some of the kids will try to distract themselves by playing with toys or drawing as a way to cope with the frustration of delaying pleasure. In a similar study, researchers showed a group of chimps a small pile of candy that was accumulating more candy as time passed by, but the candy was inaccessible to them. Then they gave the chimps a set of toys. Every so often they would allow the chimps to have access to the candy. Several of the chimps figured out that the longer they waited, the more candy would accumulate, so they distracted themselves with the toys to avoid grabbing the candy until they could get a great amount.

In American culture, we not only want to survive, but we also want to remain at the peak of our powers. It is not nearly enough to be an active old person in America. We want to retain the illusion of invincibility that every teenager has. Americans are fascinated with youth and the fanciful notion of staying young forever. Time magazine once dedicated the cover and a significant portion of an issue to the topic of aging well and remaining young. Bob Dylan, one of the most popular singers in America, offers us his wish that we stay “Forever Young,” while Frank Sinatra tells us, “Fairy tales can come true, it can happen to you, if you’re young at heart.” A hugely popular film like Cocoon fantasizes an alien force that can turn the elderly into the young again, while the movie Logan’s Run imagines a “utopian” world where one is not allowed to live past the age of thirty.

Parents may often claim that they spend a lot of time with their children. Actually, what they mean is not with but in proximity of their children. That is, they may be in the same room as their child but watching TV, reading, on the phone, reviewing emails, or conversing with other guests. What is needed is active engagement with children. This implies reading together, playing sports and games together, solving puzzles together, cooking and eating together, discussing things together, joking together, shopping together, building blocks together, and washing dishes together. In other words, it is not simply being in a child’s company while simultaneously leaving the child alone but it means being an active participant and partner in activities with the child.

Sometimes, we are fascinated when our assumptions are turned inside out and around. The artist Pablo Picasso, for example, used Cubism as a way to help us see the world differently. In his famous work Three Musicians, he used abstract forms to shape the players in such an unexpected way that when you first see this artwork, you assume that nothing makes sense. Yet when you look at the painting a second time, the figures come together. Picasso's work challenges your assumptions about how space and objects are used. His artwork helps you see the world differently and reminds you there are alternative ways of using shape, objects, and colors. The reward for this is the intrinsic pleasure you get by looking at this work.

The often-used phrase "pay attention" is insightful: you dispose of a limited budget of attention that you can allocate to activities, and if you try to go beyond your budget, you will fail. It is the mark of effortful activities that they interfere with each other, which is why it is difficult or impossible to conduct several at once. You could not compute the product of 17×24 while making a left turn into dense traffic, and you certainly should not try. You can do several things at once, but only if they are easy and undemanding. You are probably safe carrying on a conversation with a passenger while driving on an empty highway, and many parents have discovered, perhaps with some guilt, that they can read a story to a child while thinking of something else.

As the only species that can actually talk, Homo sapiens is the only one that can lie out loud. This capacity gave early human beings a major evolutionary edge. They'd already demonstrated their mastery of the deceptive arts by hunting prey with artfully hidden traps or by tricking them into running off cliffs. As the human capacity to speak developed, so did our ability not only to trick prey and deceive predators but to lie to other humans. This too could be advantageous. Those who could persuade members of a rival tribe that a westward-moving herd of caribou had migrated east won a battle in the war for survival. Verbal deceitfulness gave early humans such a survival advantage that some evolutionary biologists believe the capacity to speak and the ability to lie developed hand in hand.
